WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

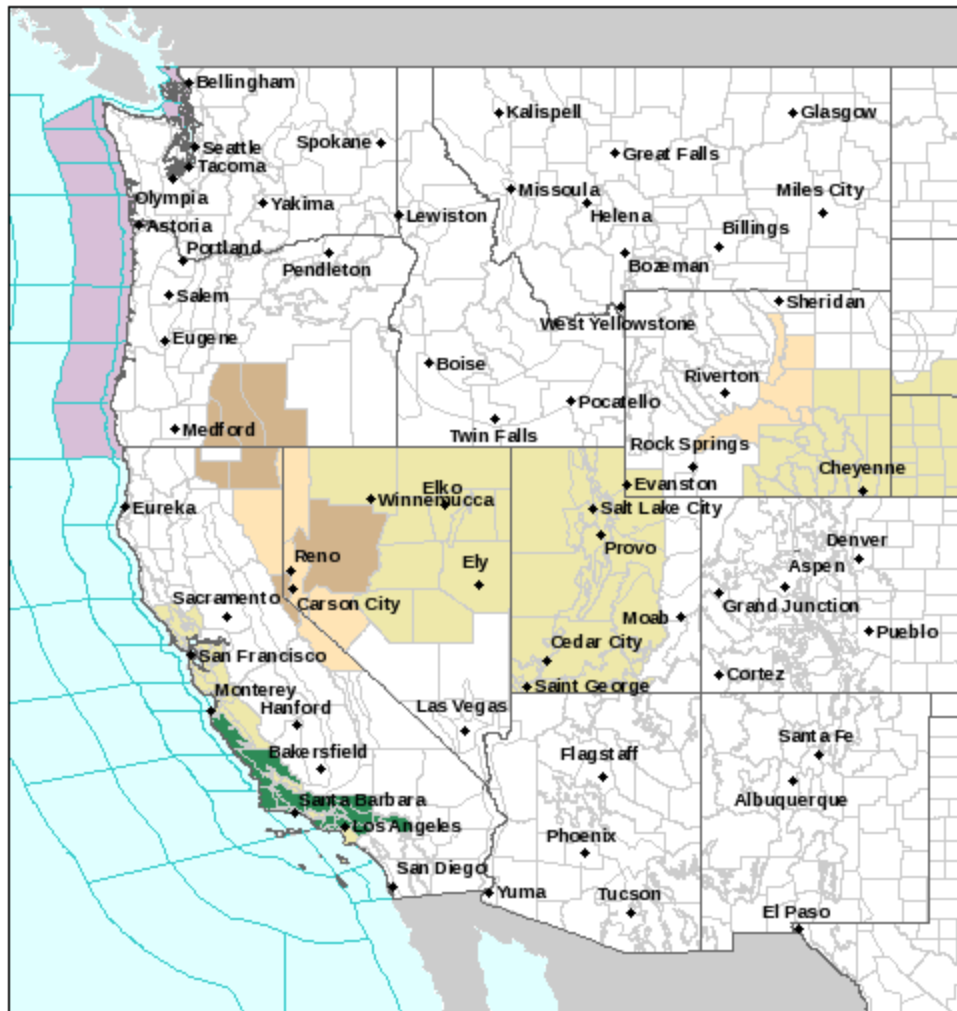

A rather wet, locally windy, unsettled weather pattern will be over the region well into next week. Many sustained periods of precipitation are expected across the region into at least early next week. A break between systems looks possible Tuesday into Wednesday. Snow levels will remain fairly high throughout this series of storms with the level around 6500 to 7000 feet at the lowest later into this weekend or early next week, including the Tahoe area. Three to five inches of storm-total precipitation amounts are expected in our mountains through Monday. Gusty, mostly southerly winds will continue today in some areas, especially the higher elevations where gusts of 35-50 mph will be rather common and locally stronger. More periods of gusty southerly winds are expected through the weekend.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

An active pattern across the Pacific will result in three storm systems impacting the area through next Tuesday. The first storm system lies just offshore early this morning. This storm will push into the Central Coast by late morning before reaching the Sierras and San Joaquin Valley during the afternoon hours. Rain will reach Southern California during the overnight hours. Although the storm is currently weakening, subtropical moisture has been entrained into the system and a band of moderate rain is expected to bring widespread wetting rains later today through Friday morning. A few thunderstorms will be possible as well over Central California tonight. Rainfall totals from this first storm will likely reach 1-3" across the Central Coast and Sierras north of Fresno County. An inch to locally 2" will be possible on south aspects of Santa Barbara, Ventura and Los Angeles County. Similar amounts may fall in the San Bernardino National Forest. Other areas south and east of Los Angeles County will generally see 0.25" - 0.50". All precipitation will decrease by Friday afternoon. Snow levels will remain above 10,000 feet with the first storm. Saturday will be drier and warmer with valley temperatures reaching the 70s to lower 80s. A second, colder system will bring widespread rainfall to the northern half of the state. This second system may remain further north which will keep most of the precipitation confined to the northern parts of the district. Another 1-2" of rain will be possible late Saturday night into Sunday in Monterey County and Yosemite National Park northward. The snow level may fall to 7,500' in the northern Sierras by Sunday morning. The rest of the area will see trace to a quarter of an inch Sunday. It will turn windy in the Sierras Saturday evening through Sunday where wind gusts to 50 mph will be possible above 9,000 feet. After a warmer day Monday, the last in the series of storms will reach the state early next week. This last system may end up dropping a bit further south than Sunday's storm and most of the area will see a good chance of light wetting rain late Monday night into Tuesday. Drier and warmer weather will likely close out the rest of next week.
